

that present passed by sailing ships and steamers bound to the East Indies. Naples—with the exception of Barcelona, the chief port of the Mediterranean—is an almost unknown name. The greatest cities of Europe are as yet but little known to us. The world will give its shippers sufficient material while other cities, in proportion to their resources to this starting point, will also share in them. We also, with our well known commercial skill and enterprise, may be large gainers by the charge of costs.

SITUATIONS WITH THE PACHA.

In March, 1865, by a convention agreed upon between the company and the Pacha of Egypt, the former obtained large concessions of land and a power of increasing their working force on the canal. As many as twenty-five thousand men were employed at the same time, reducing us of the early periods of Egyptian history, when, as we see in their paintings, whole armies of men were engaged in works which one small engine could execute more easily. The French government was pleased, by the British agents, and even by the British embassy at Constantinople, the French company was charged with unfair treatment of the laborers and with grasping immense sum of money along the line, the cost which would have been necessary to obtain such a concession. The Pacha proposed a change of his relations with the company, asking it to reduce the number of laborers to six thousand, to increase the pay of each man, and to release the "canal-contract" already made. This was refused to complete the fresh water supply at his own expense and to refund to whom they had already paid for their construction so far as accomplished.

The proposal was rejected by the company, principally the reduction of the force of laborers which would retard the completion of the work for many years. The difficulties were finally submitted to the arbitration of the French Emperor. The Pacha who evidently determined to proceed to obtain a modification of his concession, or else to terminate it, sent a memorandum to the Emperor, who was consider'd to be just to all parties, and the work was prosecuted with renewed vigor.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

There are some interesting circumstances connected with this great work that do not fall directly within any of the topics already discussed, or as yet are of historical value. One of them is that the French Minister of Finance has entered into a convention with the great steamship company known as the maritime service of the Empereur Impérial, by which its routes are to be changed so as to make its northern terminus at St. Petersburg, Russia, and its southern terminus at the Suez Canal, the beginning of the new transit. He has as it may, the Pacha proposed a change of his relations with the company, asking it to reduce the number of laborers to six thousand, to increase the pay of each man, and to release the "canal-contract" already made. This was refused to complete the fresh water supply at his own expense and to refund to whom they had already paid for their construction so far as accomplished.
